Two little autumn leaves

It was autumn and the trees were all losing their leaves. On one big tree there were only two little leaves, one brown and yellow and the other one orange and red. The first leaf was called Brownie and the other one Reddy. When the trees started losing their leaves, Brownie and Reddy decided to stay on the tree as long as they possibly could, but it took some clinging, because the gusty autumn wind tried very hard to blow them down. The wind blew and blew but Brownie and Reddy just hung on as tightly as they could and laughed at the wind.

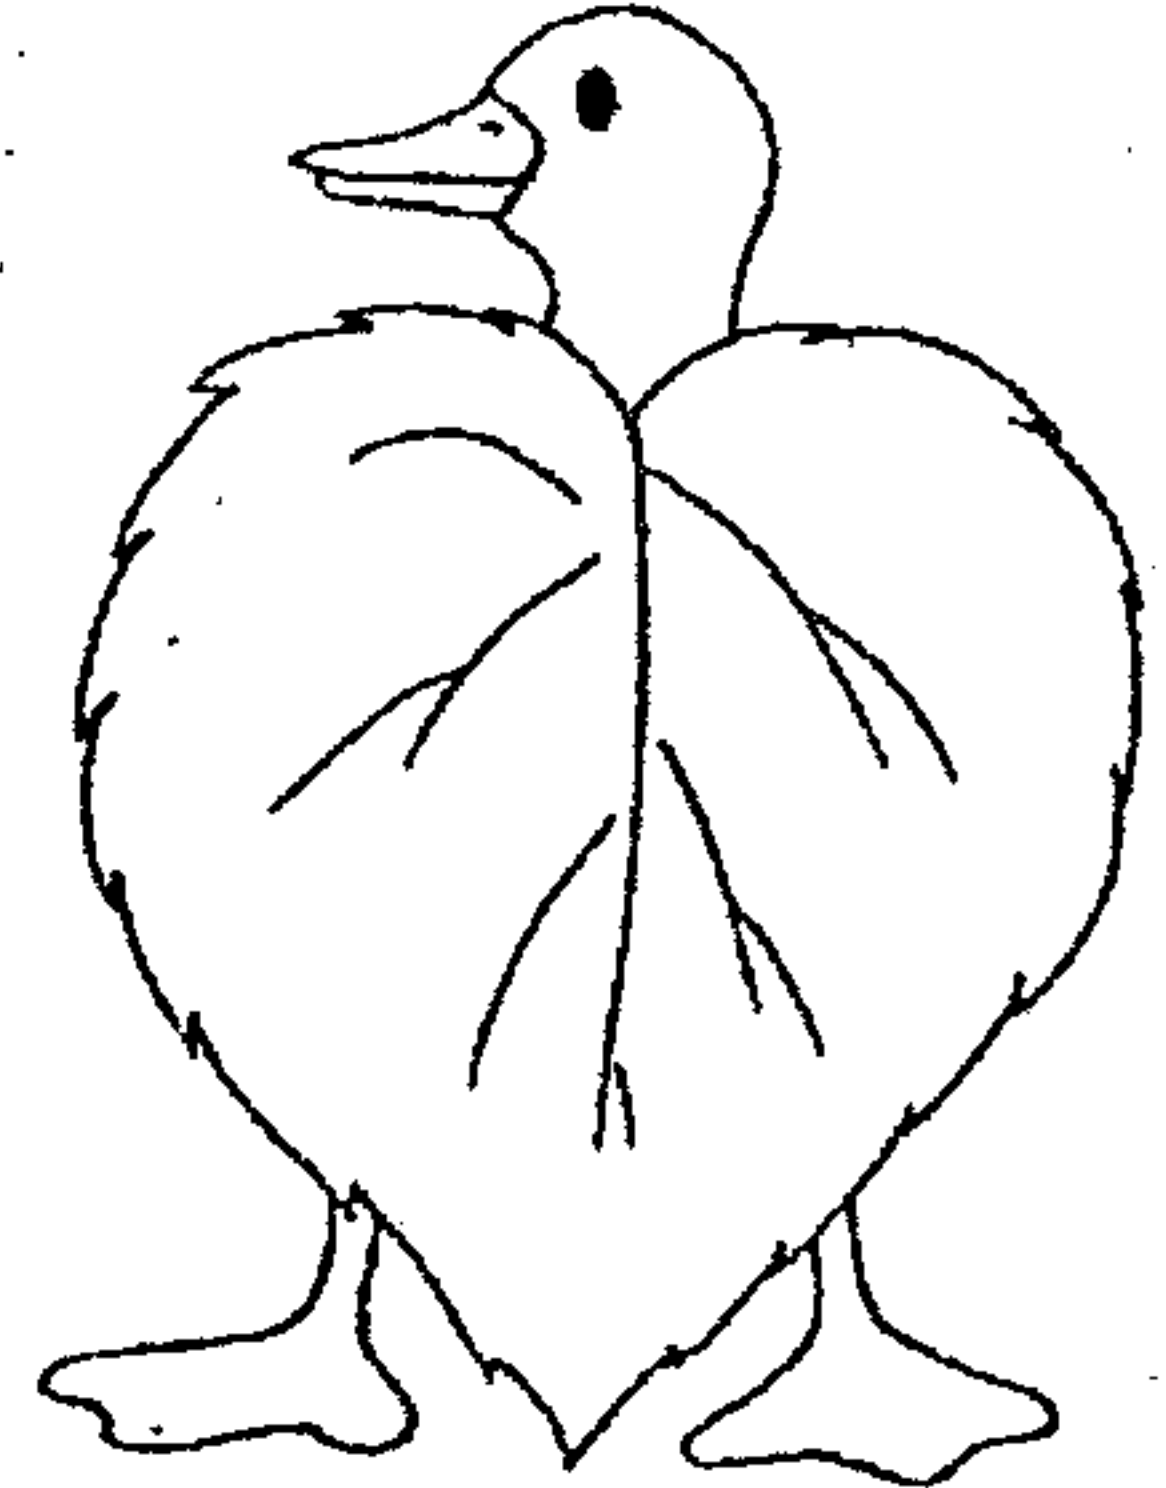

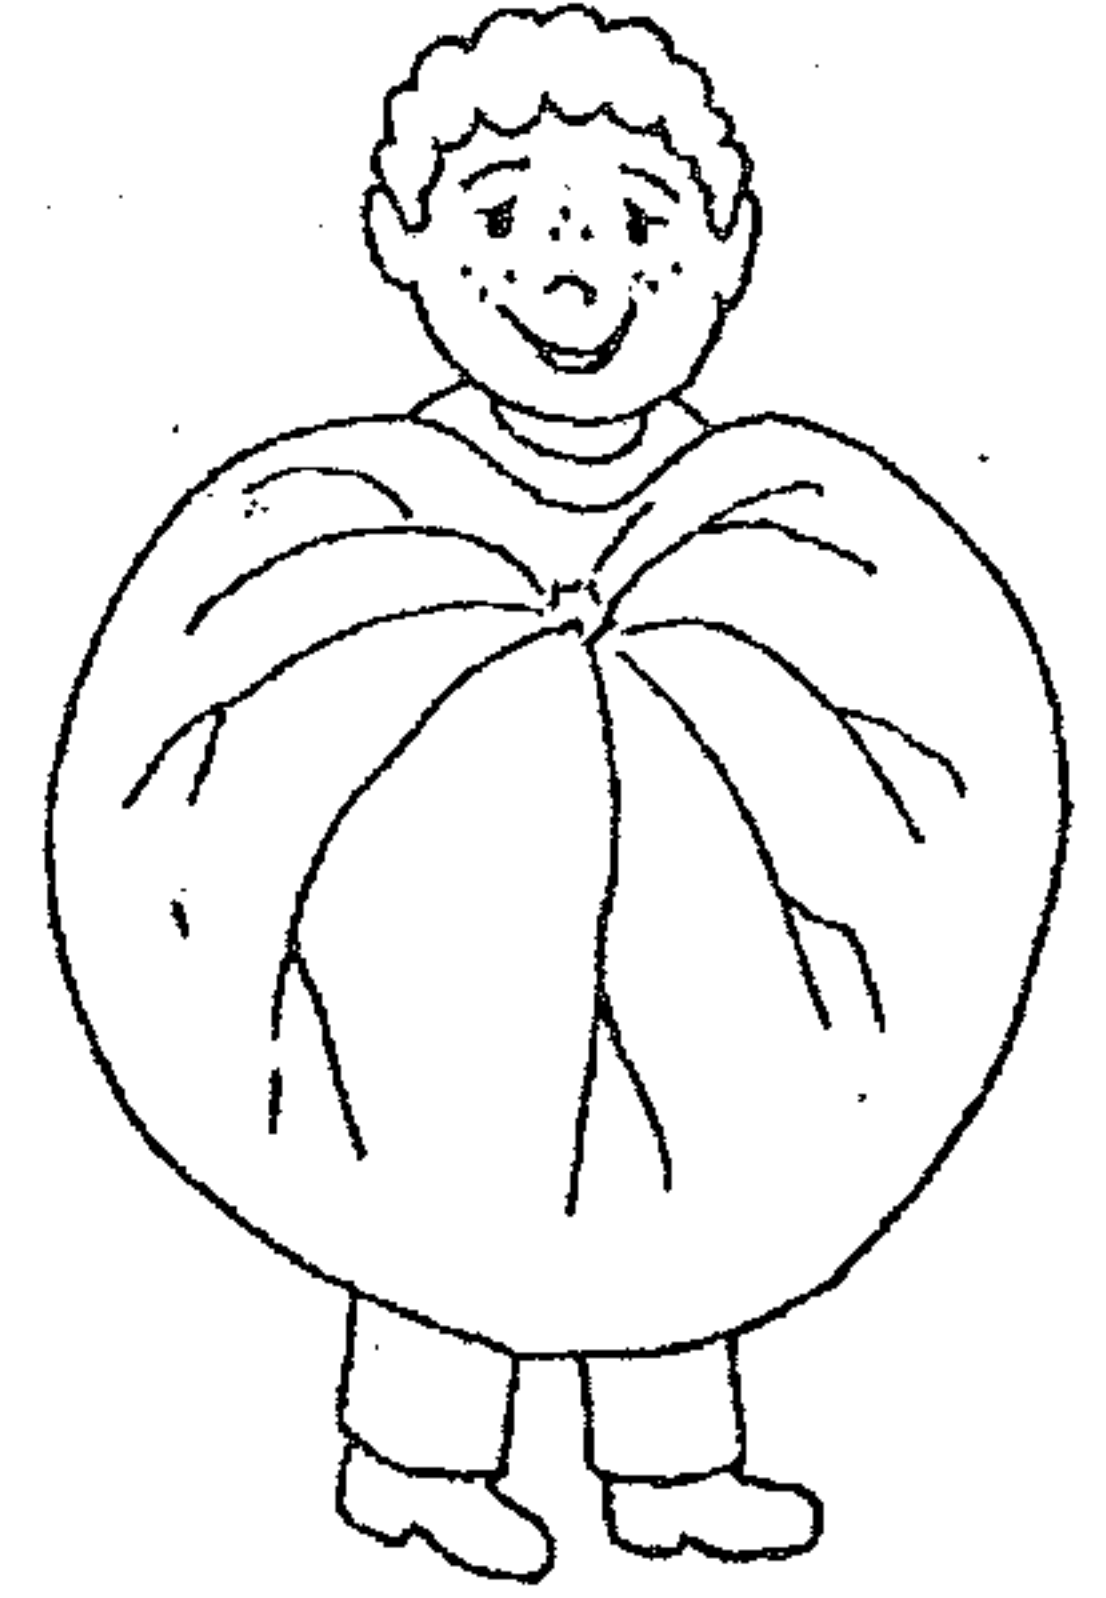

All the other leaves were already on the ground and had found cosy resting places. Brownie and Reddy got tired of clinging onto the tree, and it was getting colder and colder. "I think we must let go," said Brownie. "I think so too," said Reddy. "Right," said Brownie, "when the next gust of wind comes, I'll race you to the corner of the shed."

"Won't the wind get a surprise when we suddenly let go," they laughed. "Here comes the wind, let's go!"

The two little autumn leaves raced each other to the corner of the shed. They arrived there together. "Make room for us," they laughed at the other leaves. "Don't disturb us," they said. "Go away, we are nicely settled here."

"Oh dear," they said. "No room for us!" The wind came and swooshed them around the corner of the shed and carried them off.

"Why did we wait so long?" they said. "Now the wind will blow us around all winter." But the wind was only teasing them. It blew them around and around till they were quite giddy, and then dropped them under a bush. "Sleep well, little leaves" the wind said, as they cuddled up to sleep.
